his rightful power. He sort of wins in the end, pulling down a temple on everyone's head including his own. The front of the temple with its row of columns has an uncanny resemblance to the Supreme Court building. Well, it is a temple of justice I guess. Could the analogy be carried to a day when this new justice votes to overturn Roe v Wade and the reaction across the country, the loss of confidence, erodes the perceived objectivity of the court? The columns symbolically collapsing around this critical third tier of the National government? I hope not. As you read this the Senate committee has voted up or down the nominee. The Senate will then confirm and Justice Kavanaugh will be on the highest court in our legal system for more years than I expect to be around. As I write this over a thousand professors of law at universities all over the country have sent a petition to the Senate committee asking that the candidate not be confirmed. They cite his temperament as reason - not any alleged indiscretions around sex and drinking. They are uncomfortable with his statements that one of the political parties is out to get him. His statement that Bill and Hillary are out to get him. Statements like this are fine and expected of a political actor but absolutely NOT from judge who will be ask to make law relating to political controversies. Cesar's wife need not just be pure but appear and act pure. The same for a judge. How will we expect him to be impartial now? Simple...we wont.
